Practice-based Research

Research Focus

Practice-based research on Japanese ACG and two-dimensional culture, focusing on cosplay, virtual performance, participatory fandom, and digital platforms.

Major Practices

- Conducted sustained cosplay practice as embodied and performative cultural research, focusing on character enactment, visual identity, fandom participation, and Japanese ACG culture.
- Conducted sustained digital cultural practice as a virtual streamer (V-Tuber) on the Chinese platform Bilibili, focusing on virtual performance, audience participation, and platform-mediated cultural interaction.
- Produced and performed content related to Japanese animation, game culture, virtual performance, cosplay, and anime song cover performances.

Platform

- Bilibili: <https://space.bilibili.com/103596519>

Language Skills

- Chinese (Mandarin): Native
- Korean: Near-native proficiency (TOPIK Level 6)
- Japanese: Basic proficiency, with over 20 years of continuous exposure to Japanese ACG cultural content, resulting in strong language intuition and listening comprehension (JLPT N5; continued study)

Language Certificates

- Korean Language Proficiency (TOPIK) View Certificate \(PDF\)
- Japanese Language Proficiency (JLPT) View Certificate \(PDF\)

Public Engagement & Media

- Operated a China-oriented overseas cultural communication account on Sina Weibo with official Orange V verification, with follower count peaking at approximately 129,000 during its active period (2014 – 2022); the account has since been largely inactive.

- Editorial contributor for a WeChat public account specializing in Korean food culture (Aug 2017 – Dec 2017).

Personal Values & Academic Disposition

The origin of my academic interest lies in a long-standing engagement with Japanese animation culture. In 1999, I first encountered the animated series Detective Conan through television, an experience that sparked a sustained fascination with Japanese anime and two-dimensional culture. My current research on Japanese subculture and ACG media may thus be understood as a return to this original intellectual motivation, now approached through systematic academic training and methodological rigor.

While my initial academic orientation was shaped by Japanese popular culture, my decision to study and live in Korea was motivated by a strong interest in K-pop and contemporary Korean popular culture. This led to my successful participation in auditions organized by Korean entertainment companies in China and, subsequently, to more than two years of professional training as a trainee in the Korean entertainment industry. First-hand exposure to embodied training regimes, evaluation systems, aesthetic standards, and production workflows enabled me to understand popular culture not merely as a site of consumption, but as a structured system of cultural production.

I majored in Korea – Japan Cultural Content at the undergraduate level and have since accumulated over twelve years of academic and everyday life experience in Korea. Rather than examining Korean or Japanese culture in isolation, my research strength lies in analyzing cultural phenomena emerging at the intersection of the two—including processes of exchange, adaptation, mediation, and reinterpretation across media platforms. I am particularly equipped to articulate these dynamics by drawing upon deep familiarity with both cultural contexts and expressing them in academically grounded analytical terms.

My academic disposition is grounded in perseverance, ethical self-discipline, and a strong sense of responsibility. From early education through doctoral training, I have consistently maintained rigorous personal standards in time management and task execution, regarding punctuality and reliability not as exceptional qualities, but as fundamental conditions for sustaining trust in academic and organizational environments.

A formative experience at the age of seventeen, during which I reduced my body weight from approximately 100 kilograms to 70 kilograms and subsequently maintained disciplined physical training and daily routines, reinforced my understanding of long-term commitment, self-regulation, and consistency. These principles continue to inform my approach to long-term research planning and sustained scholarly inquiry.

Extended periods of independent living abroad have further strengthened my ability to respond autonomously and calmly to uncertainty. Combined with a reflective, meaning-oriented personal disposition—often associated with the INFJ profile—I tend to approach research problems by examining their underlying structures rather than surface-level phenomena. I consider academic work to be grounded not only in intellectual ability, but also in character, consistency, and responsibility, values that guide my engagement in research, collaboration, and cross-cultural inquiry.

※Academic Positioning Statement

Since entering Sangmyung University in 2016, I have continuously pursued the field of Cultural Content Studies through the completion of my doctoral degree in 2026, forming a continuous ten-year academic trajectory.

Sangmyung University has, since around 2016, increasingly developed into a Seoul-based university with a strong emphasis on comprehensive culture- and arts-related education, with notable programs in fields such as games, animation, music, dance, film and visual media, and cultural content. My own academic pathway was formed within this broader institutional environment, but remained consistently oriented toward the humanities-based and theory-driven study of Cultural Content.

At the undergraduate level, I earned a Bachelor of Arts in Cultural Content Studies, with a major in Korea-Japan Cultural Content. At the graduate level, I was affiliated with the Department of Global Culture Contents. Across my undergraduate, master's, and doctoral training, my academic foundation consistently remained within Cultural Content Studies.

The Department of Global Culture Contents, to which I belonged during my graduate studies, was established in 2020 as a new department within the General Graduate School of Sangmyung University. Its institutional lineage can be traced back to the former Department of Creative Contents under Sangmyung University's Special Graduate School (Korean: 특수대학원 창의콘텐츠학과). I was the first foreign national to enroll in the department and the first foreign national to earn a doctoral degree from it.

Compared with established departments with ten or even several decades of institutional history, the department was relatively new. Its academic structure, education and research supervision systems, and degree-conferral framework were still undergoing gradual development and refinement, while also being influenced by existing institutional structures and their historical legacy.

The former Special Graduate School primarily served working professionals and adult learners pursuing graduate education alongside their professional careers. Its institutional orientation differed from that of the General Graduate School, which was primarily oriented toward academic research and researcher training. In principle, the former Special Graduate School offered master's degree programs rather than doctoral programs.

This institutional lineage, together with the developmental context of the newly established department, is essential to understanding the formal designation of my doctoral degree and its particular institutional background.

Because my graduate field inherited part of that earlier institutional framework, it retained certain structural limitations and residual features of the old system, while also enrolling a substantial number of students from arts- and practice-oriented backgrounds. As a result, the degree designation in my case reflects not the actual nature of my own academic training, but the historical constraints and transitional legacy of the older departmental and degree-granting system.

It is particularly important to emphasize that I was not admitted through Special Admissions for Foreign Nationals (외국인특별전형) or Out-of-Quota Admissions (정원외). Instead, in 2020, I applied through the General Admissions (일반전형) process of Sangmyung University's General Graduate School under the Within-Quota Admissions (정원내) system, competing directly with Korean applicants. I successfully passed the selection process and began my master's studies in the Department of Global Culture Contents in September 2020.

My admission followed the same academic selection procedures as those applied to other research-oriented departments awarding Ph.D. degrees within the General Graduate School. Prior to formally applying, I underwent preliminary selection and acceptance by my prospective academic supervisor, followed by a series of formal admission procedures, including rigorous evaluation of my research proposal and supporting application documents, review of my research plan by my prospective supervisor, and a formal interview. I successfully completed these procedures and obtained admission. This was not an admission process based solely on documentary review, but the same formal academic selection process followed by other research-oriented departments.

Subsequently, when applying to transfer to the integrated master's–doctoral program, I underwent another formal academic selection and review process, including evaluation of my research plan by my academic supervisor, examination of the relevant application documents, and an interview. Having successfully passed the required assessments, I formally transferred to the integrated master's–doctoral program in March 2022. Thus, both my initial admission to the master's program and my subsequent progression to doctoral-level study were subject to formal academic qualification reviews and selection procedures. My eligibility for doctoral-level study was not granted solely on the basis of my existing enrollment in the master's program.

Within that institutional setting, however, my own pathway belonged clearly to the Cultural Content Studies direction, characterized by a humanities-based, theory-driven, and research-oriented formation. It should therefore be distinguished both from historically common professional, in-service, and older mid-career study patterns and from the more arts- or practice-led doctoral profiles that were associated with other directions in the broader field.

During my doctoral training, I completed rigorous scholarly work including academic writing and publication, conference presentations, and participation in research projects. Therefore, although the diploma formally designates the degree as Doctor of Arts (D.A.), the actual training pathway, academic standards, and research outcomes should be understood as those of a Ph.D.-level research doctorate in the humanities. In this sense, the doctoral title conferred upon me should be regarded as academically equivalent in standing and function to a Ph.D., rather than as a professional, arts-based, or practice-led doctorate.
